Excerpts from Flower Remedies: How Plants' Energies Can Heal Us

For those of you who aren't already familiar with them, let me briefly explain. Also known as flower essences, these liquids are based on the energy fields of plants. They're not to be confused with aromatherapy, where you apply aromatic substances called essential oils, which are based on aromatic extracts from flowers or plants.

When I first encountered the flower remedies in 1981, I was both a psychotherapist and an astrologer, but after a decade of practice in both fields, I'd come to an impasse. Though they both helped people find insight into their problems, neither brought about the desired changes in people's problems with any degree of speed or reliability.

Frustrated with the lack of results, I began searching for additional methods to incorporate into my work. Almost immediately, I encountered the flower remedies in an adult education class and recognized in them the tool I was looking for.

How do they work? I have no idea--any more than I could tell you why and how astrology works! I can only tell you that the oldest of these product lines, the Bach Remedies, have been tested and used worldwide for more than 70 years with excellent results.

Want Photographic Proof that the Essences Work? See Dr. Deborah Bier's research at http://www.floweressencemagazine.com/blog/?p=979. These photos of an experiment conducted by Deborah and her students clearly show the positive effect an essence mixture has on germinating and growing plants.

In the early stages of remedy studies, people can be in a hurry to take them all, because most of us identify with so many of the descriptions. In the Bach kit, for instance, there are at least six or seven having to do with depression and discouragement. Some people who struggled with depression for years took all those preparations at once and had a painful catharsis. Do yourself a favor and avoid this "kill or cure" approach!

How many is too many? Some teachers say no more than four should be given. Dr. Bach apparently also said that no more than five essences should be given. While this can be a useful guideline, it is more of an individual matter. Some individuals at some points in time can handle no more than one. Others can assimilate eight or more of the exactly correct choices at the precisely correct point in time.

Sometimes the most potent number of remedies to take is ONE. Like in homeopathic or herbal practice, the essence practitioner who can identify the needed remedy that can make an immense difference. The right remedy at the right time allowed to work on its own without interference can be a great catalyst to swift healing.

Sometimes this happens when you identify the person's constitutional or type remedy--that is, one single remedy that seems to be a dominant lifelong theme. Over and over again in my practice, I have seen a judiciously chosen single remedy act quickly and deeply, producing a profound shift in the situation.

It's wise to pass up trying to cure other people's addictions through the flower remedies. Chances are, it won't work, and if you're involved with them personally in any way, you probably lack the needed objectivity.

More importantly, people who are heavily addicted or on powerful tranquilizers ordinarily don't respond well to the essences. The addicted person may drink or drug even more heavily to deaden the emotions that come up, since they're addicted, in part, to avoid their feelings in the first place.

How a Single Essence Can Benefit an Entire Family

Red Chestnut, originally developed by Dr. Edward Bach, is well known as a remedy for over-anxious mothers, especially for those times when mother love becomes smother love. It's suggested for moms who continually fret over things that they imagine might happen to loved ones.

They automatically fear the worst in any situation, like that a child's minor fever is really catastrophic illness setting in, or that their husband who is half an hour late has been in a traffic accident. This excessive--even intrusive--concern does nothing to actually help the situation and becomes a drain on everyone.

As many essence practitioners have observed, at times an entire household may need to take a particular essence, not just the person who is expressing symptoms. It's easy to see how Mom might require this remedy, but how might it impact the family system? An entire household needing Red Chestnut would be a warren of worrywarts!

However, chronic negative thoughts are contagious and can create self-fulfilling prophecies. If Mom keeps projecting a certain undesirable outcome--her husband losing his job, for instance, or her daughter getting in with the wrong crowd--then little by little, it begins to seem like a possibility to others in the home too.

We could all name Moms who ought to have an intravenous drip of Red Chestnut, but lots of Dads need it too. Given that men are generally reticent about sharing their fears, the need for this remedy may show up in exaggerated "Head of the Household" behaviors.

Astrology and Flower Remedies – Definitely a Match Made in Heaven!

Flower remedies became part of my astrological practice in 1981. These natural, gentle substances can add a great deal to astrologers' work with clients. The right flower remedy mixture given at the right astrological moment can produce an impressive amount of change. This is just a sampler and isn't meant to be comprehensive, for it would take a whole book to cover the topic in the depth it deserves.

When a reading is going well, and you're getting at the roots of persistent and troublesome patterns, the client experiences a sudden growth in consciousness of the underlying difficulties. Seeing the problem so clearly, the client is often strongly motivated to do something about it. The reading can be an impetus for growth. If so, toward the end of the reading the client is very likely to ask, "Now What? What can I do to change this pattern?"

One tool for growth that the practicing astrologer can offer clients is a mixture of flower remedies relevant to the issues discussed in the reading.

For instance, suppose the person's Sun is severely challenged, and so the person suffers from lack of confidence, low self-esteem, or even self-hate. When this is the case, it's more difficult for people to believe in themselves and to make forward steps. Mixing some of the flower remedies various companies offer for self-esteem, like Sunflower or Buttercup, can help the client make a fundamental shift.

If you've worked with the flower remedies for a while, you may have noticed that particular remedies may lie dormant in the box for months or even years, and suddenly every second client needs them. These ebbs and flows in the Fleur du Jour seem to be evoked by the planetary combinations that form in the sky. Transits often accompany a temporary aggravation of the problem, thereby stimulating awareness and change. Essences and other forms of vibrational healing may set in motion a similar period of heightened awareness and insight.
